Overview

A framework for structuring hybrid and remote consulting engagements to maintain genuine client relationship depth and delivery quality, treating virtual delivery as its own discipline with its own best practices rather than an in-person engagement conducted imperfectly over video.

Is remote consulting delivery inherently lower quality than in-person? Not inherently — the quality gap usually comes from treating virtual delivery as a degraded substitute for in-person methods rather than designing deliberately for the virtual medium's specific strengths and constraints.

What consulting activities genuinely benefit from staying in-person?

Activities requiring high-bandwidth relationship building (early trust establishment, sensitive change conversations) or complex group facilitation often still benefit from in-person presence — this playbook helps distinguish those from activities that work equally well or better virtually.
