Overview

A framework for individual consultants and advisors to build genuine thought leadership — a distinctive, defensible point of view on a specific topic — as a foundation for trusted advisor status, distinct from generic content marketing volume.

How is this different from the firm-level Thought Leadership &

Content Marketing for Consultants Playbook? That playbook covers firm-level content marketing strategy broadly. This one is specifically about an individual advisor building a distinctive personal point of view as a foundation for trusted advisor status with specific clients — a narrower, more personal discipline.

Does having a large content output (many articles, posts) equal thought leadership? Not necessarily — this playbook's core distinction is between volume of content and genuine distinctiveness of point of view; a smaller body of work with a real, defensible perspective often builds trusted advisor status faster than high-volume generic content.
