Overview

A framework for commercial excellence specifically in SaaS and cloud businesses — organizing commercial strategy and operations around SaaS-specific metrics (net revenue retention, CAC payback, usage-based expansion signals) that predict business health differently than traditional one-time-sale business metrics.

Aren't standard commercial metrics like revenue and win rate sufficient for SaaS businesses too? These remain relevant but insufficient alone — SaaS business health depends heavily on metrics traditional one-time-sale businesses don't need to track as centrally, particularly net revenue retention and CAC payback period, which reveal sustainability dynamics standard revenue metrics alone don't capture.

Why does net revenue retention matter so much specifically for SaaS commercial excellence? It captures whether the existing customer base is growing or shrinking in value independent of new customer acquisition — a SaaS business can show strong headline revenue growth while masking a declining or negative net revenue retention that signals genuine underlying business health problems.
