Overview

A framework for commercial excellence in selling sustainability and green offerings — grounding sustainability value propositions in credible, verifiable evidence buyers can defend internally, avoiding the common pitfall of sustainability marketing claims that invite buyer skepticism or accusations of greenwashing.

Why do sustainability-focused sales conversations sometimes struggle to convert despite genuine buyer interest in sustainability? Buyers increasingly scrutinize sustainability claims for credibility, and vague or unverifiable claims can trigger skepticism or greenwashing concerns even when the underlying sustainability value is genuine — credible, verifiable evidence is essential for these claims to actually support the sale.

What makes a sustainability value proposition credible enough for buyers to defend it internally? Specific, verifiable evidence — third-party certification, quantified impact data, transparent methodology — that the buyer can reference confidently if their own sustainability or procurement claims are later scrutinized internally or externally.
