

Good Decisions Beat Good Outcomes

Idea In Short

Every professional has rough days: disengaged clients, technical failures, delays that eat an entire day of planned work. What separates people who sustain a long, successful career from those who burn out is not the absence of bad days, but a clear-headed distinction between the quality of a decision and the quality of its outcome. Over time, good decisions consistently produce good results, even when any single decision happens to go badly due to factors entirely outside anyone's control.

Bad Days Are Part of the Job

Every professional working closely with clients, teams or partners eventually has a genuinely rough stretch: a disengaged client, technology that fails at the worst possible moment, long travel delays, significant effort spent simply getting into a room for a meeting that produces little visible progress. None of this reflects poorly on the underlying quality of the work; it simply reflects the reality that outcomes depend on far more than any one person's effort or skill.

Be Proud of What You Can Control

The only thing anyone genuinely controls is the quality of their own work and their attitude toward it. That does not mean expecting perfection or superhuman results; it means recognizing that being hired to do good work, and then actually doing good work, is itself worth genuine satisfaction, independent of how a client or market ultimately responds to it.

Decision Quality Is Not the Same as Outcome Quality

A well-known concept from decision science, often called "resulting," describes the common mistake of judging a decision purely by its outcome and assuming a good result always reflects good decision making.¹ Running a red light and arriving safely does not retroactively make running the light a good decision; the decision was reckless regardless of the outcome. Organizations that genuinely value sound decision-making processes tend to evaluate choices on the quality of the reasoning and information available at the time, not solely on how things happened to turn out afterward.

Strategy Is Good Decisions Plus Luck

Acknowledging the role of luck can feel uncomfortable for anyone who prefers clean frameworks and tidy spreadsheets, since it means accepting that some outcomes sit genuinely outside anyone's control. Yet luck is real and measurable in its effects: the most qualified candidate does not always land the interview, the best product does not always succeed in the market, and the most promising venture does not always secure the funding or partnership it deserves. Recognizing this does not excuse poor decisions, but it does mean judging results fairly requires separating the quality of a decision from the randomness surrounding its outcome.

People Are Beautiful and Messy

No professional can guarantee that every client, colleague or stakeholder will become a genuine advocate, and no one can eliminate every skeptic or difficult personality from a working relationship. People bring their own histories, moods and blind spots into every interaction, and much of that variability sits entirely outside anyone else's control. Doing solid work and feeling genuinely good about that effort, regardless of how any individual person responds to it, is a healthier standard than expecting universal appreciation.

Extending Genuine Grace

After a difficult stretch where the work was sound but the outcome fell short anyway, extending real grace to yourself and your team matters more than most professionals admit. Taking a break, resting properly, and returning with a clear head tends to produce far better long-term results than pushing through exhaustion while quietly resenting an outcome no one could fully control. How people handle themselves under pressure is often what colleagues remember longest, well after the specific project details fade.

Focus on What Lasts

Beyond any single project or client relationship, the qualities that compound over a full career are the ones worth deliberate attention: professionalism, craft, accumulated experience, genuine relationships and durable assets built over time.² A single bad week rarely threatens any of these, provided the underlying decisions and effort remained sound throughout.

Building the Habit Over a Career

None of this comes naturally; it takes deliberate, repeated practice to separate a decision's quality from its outcome in the moment, especially right after a disappointing result. Professionals who build this habit early tend to recover from setbacks faster, because they spend less energy on regret over things they never controlled and more energy refining the parts of their process that genuinely were within their control.³ Over enough decisions, made consistently well, the compounding effect on both results and reputation becomes difficult to ignore.

- 1Outcome bias
- 2Deliberate practice
- 3Bounded rationality

Summary

Good decisions, made consistently and evaluated honestly, produce good results over time, even though any single outcome can be shaped heavily by luck. Separating decision quality from outcome quality, and extending genuine grace to yourself and your team after a difficult stretch, builds the resilience needed to sustain a long professional career.